I don't want the traditional "DoubleClick to edit" for I'm going to be dragging items over a "blank" canvas (in my case, moving items over an existing canvas) in order to recreate the list. I think I'd have to add a "hook" to the ListEditor object that would then have to convert the event into a jquery event. Would I be correct in thinking that the event chain is: (my application layer) -> ListEditor() --> ListItems() --> ListItemEditor() ---> ListEditorHook()? A: That's exactly what the event handlers do. In pure JavaScript you would check if the event.target was the element on which the event was dispatched. That element has a property "checked" which can be set by the user. If it's set, you are in a list editing mode, otherwise, you aren't. With JQuery, it's a bit more complex because this check happens at a higher level (in the element's event handlers). So, you have to compute the new state of your list (which is, in your case, "checked"), and then issue an "uncheck" event on your elements. Security experts, working on behalf of defence manufacturer Harris Technology Group (HTG), were able to crack the complex encryption used by a new iPhone model ahead of its launch. While the tech giant is yet to comment on the cause of the vulnerability, the heads of the White House's National Security Council had reportedly met to discuss the latest iOS vulnerability. HTG – which makes a number of security products, including the Unlocked iPhone (ULT) and the Unlocked Samsung Galaxy (GOOG) – claimed the patch for the vulnerability is ready and will be offered to customers on Tuesday. Though the company said that the new device will be compatible with a patch released for a similar vulnerability yesterday, it did not clarify whether 82138339de
